What happens to caste under conditions of modernity is a question that has bothered scholars for close to a century now. This lecture will of course not be able to even provide a broad outline of the complex terrain of this body of work. What I hope to do then is to offer a thumbnail sketch of a) the theoretical work on 'caste in modernity', b) the demands modernity makes on the caste subject and the ways in which the caste subject speaks, and c) the structural transformations of the caste world.
